About

Just what do compassion and charity really look like -- especially in healthcare?

Greetings!

July 23, 2015

BRI has truly some of the brightest, most committed, compassionate and articulate medical students among our student leadership. You've met several of them over the years when they've written or been highlighted in a BRI newsletter like this one. It takes a lot for busy medical students not only to stay on top of their very important studies, but also to delve into healthcare policy, write and rewrite blog posts, produce events, and be ambassadors for healthcare solutions that work. We deeply appreciate everything they do.

John Flo, BRI Student Leader, SLUSOM

John Flo, (St. Louis University School of Medicine) has done it again. While holding a coveted internship at The Heritage Foundation, he wrote a thoughtful, articulate piece, "In healthcare reform, what do compassion and charity look like?" We encourage you to read it to expand understanding the socialized medicine champions' viewpoint. As you might guess, BRI's position is that socialized, big government medicine is neither compassionate nor charitable, and Mr. Flo's article exposes this in a truly thoughtful way.

It's not too late!

Send a deserving student to FMMA & save on your membership

Between now and July 31st, all new and renewed BRI memberships and donations are earmarked to send deserving students to the 2nd Annual FMMA (Free Market Medical Association) Conference, "Disruptive Changes: Treating Patients Better and Faster with Transparent Prices and a Free Market" taking place in Oklahoma City, August 21 - 22. Last year we sent seven medical students; this year we seek to send twice as many! Dues go up August 1st, so join today to save money on your BRI membership and support this great cause.
